October 4th is World Animal Day.
The state of emergency of the Corona disaster drastically reduced the number of visitors to the zoo, and the zoo and aquarium were also hit hard.

Zoos and aquariums that were closed to prevent the spread of the new coronavirus infection seem to be gradually reopening as the state of emergency is lifted.
On the other hand, even after resuming business, there are still facilities with various restrictions such as "admission is limited to residents of the prefecture", "weekdays only", "some facilities and events are suspended", and "business shortening".

If you find it difficult to meet the animals in person, feed them at home at the zoo on this site.

Depending on the number of clicks (*), a part of the sponsorship money obtained from the sponsors of this special feature will be donated to the Japanese Association of Zoos and Aquariums (<https://www.jaza.jp/>).

* We have set an upper limit on the amount of donations (up to a total donation of 100,000 yen).
* 1 click = 1 yen donation. You can feed one kind of animal once a day.

Leveraging Machine Learning to Quickly Adapt

Early Prediction of Visitor Engagement in Science Museums with Multimodal Learning Analytics

ABSTRACT

Modeling visitor engagement is a key challenge in informal learning environments, such as museums and science centers. Devising predictive models of visitor engagement that accurately forecast salient features of visitor behavior, such as dwell time, holds significant potential for enabling adaptive learning environments and visitor analytics for museums and science centers. In this paper, we introduce a multimodal early prediction approach to modeling visitor engagement with interactive science museum exhibits. We utilize multimodal sensor data—including eye gaze, facial expression, posture, and interaction log data—captured during visitor interactions with an interactive museum exhibit for environmental science education, to induce predictive models of visitor dwell time. We investigate machine learning techniques (random forest, support vector machine, Lasso regression, gradient boosting trees, and multi-layer perceptron) to induce multimodal predictive models of visitor engagement with data from 85 museum visitors. Results from a series of ablation experiments suggest that incorporating additional modalities into predictive models of visitor engagement improves model accuracy. In addition, the models show improved predictive performance over time, demonstrating that increasingly accurate predictions of visitor dwell time can be achieved as more evidence becomes available from visitor interactions with interactive science museum exhibits. These findings highlight the efficacy of multimodal data for modeling museum exhibit visitor engagement.

1 Introduction

Visitor engagement plays a central role in learning in informal environments, such as museums and science centers [20, 24]. It affects how visitors navigate through a museum, form interests and attitudes, and acquire knowledge about concepts and ideas presented in exhibits. As museums strive to better understand visitor engagement, a key challenge is to devise computational models that predict how visitors interact with exhibits. Recent work in multimodal learning analytics has demonstrated the ability to model and represent learner engagement in many contexts [5, 35], which introduces the opportunity to model visitor engagement in museums [19]. Computational models of visitor engagement in museums that leverage multimodal learning analytics could inform better understandings of patterns in visitor engagement by incorporating multi-channel data streams (e.g., facial expression, eye gaze, posture, interaction logs) captured by both physical hardware sensors and exhibit-specific software. Several studies have demonstrated the efficacy of incorporating multi-channel data from students' learning interactions in multimodal sensor systems that model student knowledge [43–45, 49] and engagement [8, 13, 14, 46] in both classroom and laboratory settings. However, limited work has investigated multimodal learning analytics within informal contexts, such as science museums.

Inducing computational models of visitor engagement in museums poses significant challenges. Museum exhibits are frequently designed to foster brief interactions as visitors freely explore museums, resulting in very short dwell times [15, 28, 29].

Half Dome - Diving Board X

June, 2013

The Diving Board is perhaps one of the most spectacular viewpoints in all of Yosemite. It is also one of the more difficult to get to.

There is no official trail leading to it, but it can be reached by hiking either the Muir or Mist trails to Little Yosemite Valley, and then diverting off trail up toward the southwest face of Half Dome. After passing Lost Lake (often only a deep and wet meadow), hikers will encounter hundreds of third or fourth class climber's routes up the rock. These are marked by small stacks of rocks or

A self-paced online course complements the live program with STEM-based lessons that engage students in designing tools for deep sea exploration.

Our Changing Ocean (Grades 9-12)

Humans and other animals rely on a healthy ocean and the ecosystem services it provides. Changes that may appear small have big effects on ocean systems. Join an Aquarium educator for a live 45-minute online program to learn how human-caused changes in the ocean affect the animals that live there. A self-paced online course with supporting lessons on developing explanatory models and using predictive models complements the live program.

Gateway Ticketing Systems explores out-of-the-box revenue ideas with Fiona the Hippo

Gateway Ticketing Systems, a leading provider of admission control systems, hosted an unusual guest on its latest webinar as it explored creative ideas to generate revenue.

Gateway Ticketing Systems was pleased to welcome Cincinnati Zoo's much-loved hippopotamus Fiona as a guest panellist on its most recent Webinar Wednesday: Creative & Out-of-the-Box Ideas to Generate Revenue Now and When You Reopen.

The Cincinnati Zoo's Fiona the Hippo is Now Accepting Zoom Calls

Time to make your virtual meetings more fun while raising funds for the Cincinnati Zoo

BY MAIJA ZUMMO — APR 30, 2020 11 AM

Have you exhausted all of your weird Zoom backgrounds and turned yourself into a talking potato enough times that your co-workers are sick of interacting with you during virtual meetings?

Become the fun one in the "office" again by inviting Fiona the hippo to your next Zoom call with the Cincinnati Zoo's new program.

And it's not just for work. You can also video chat for happy hour or any other event with, yes, Fiona, but also Rico the porcupine or one of the zoo's giraffes. More animals may be added.

"We've all been on countless video calls at this point, and I know that I would love to see a new face in the mix," said Cincinnati Zoo director Thane Maynard in a release. "Imagine the look on your co-workers' faces when they see Fiona on the agenda! I'm sure the chat would fill up with questions for the world's most famous hippo!"

All calls last around 15 minutes and can be customized to the agenda and video conferencing platform. Who knows, maybe Fiona is a branding whiz and can help you with your next campaign?

A call with Fiona costs $750 for 15 minutes, Rico is $250, a giraffe is $250 and a mystery animal is $250.

All funds from the Cincinnati ZOOM meetings will go to the zoo's Emergency Operating Fund.
